WEST GEORGE STREET, 22
Kenna & Mooney Fiftywaistcoats. Kilmarnock's late Victorian and Edwardian pubs, like those of many another medium-sized Scottish town, have mainly succumbed to progress, but until recently the Railway Tavern - now known as Fiftywaistcoats - retained much of its original Edwardian character. In 1902, when it was acquired by Malcolm McCulloch, a long-established Glasgow publican, the property consisted of licenced premises with cellarage underneath and rooms overhead. The existing pub was of an old-fashioned character, with a small bar-room and several sitting rooms.
McCulloch promptly commissioned Charles H Robinson, also of Glasgow, to reconstruct the property. The building's plain ashlar exterior was extended and considerably altered, while the interior was entirely gutted out. On the ground floor of the premises there was formed a spacious and well-lit public bar. This was furnished with a large island counter and a central display stand. At the rear of the premises there was a snug for sedentary drinkers and a small office for the proprietor. Underneath there was a beer cellar, a wine store, a blending cellar and a bottling room. On the upper floor there was a number of private sitting rooms and a large saloon which was admirably suitable for smoking concerts, Burns Nights and other Edwardian beanos, but which could be subdivided for more intimate gatherings. The new Railway Tavern - so called because of its proximity to the station of the GSWR - was completed in May 1903.
