AP, F 11.10.2013 — Proposed extension, including full glass wall to function suite. John Smith, architect, said proposals will 'harmonise with the existing in an elegant fusion of traditional and modern offering a new relaxing space for enjoyment both of natural daylight and garden views'. Props, Costley & Costley.

SHELL PALACE
GROTTO

AA, Th 5.6.1851, 3b — Grotto is called 'just completed'.

AA, Th 3.7.1851, 4c — Alloway. Burns Monument Hotel. Shell Palace. Called 'new' and 'recently aded by Mr Auld'.

There was a sloping bank behind Mr Auld's Inn - lying on the east side of the Doon, betwixt the Old and new Bridges - hitherto occupied as an orchard, that, saving by plain, dull contrast of fruit trees, contributed nothing to the general effect, which has now, by no common labour and art, been converted into a tea garden, where summer parties may be entertained with music out of doors, something after the Parisian style of recreation. On this shelving bank Mr Auld has just completed what was at first styled the 'Shell Grotto.

Like its great prototype [the 1851 Crystal Palace], the Shell Palace, to be judged of must be seen. It is not easy to describe even this miniature. Lying in the heart of the Monumenrt scenery, it forms a fitting spot for something dazzingly beautiful; and it realises the aspiration. It is a palace of which rare and beautiful shells, gathered in many climes, form the entire surface internal and external. The erection is 20 feet long, by 14½ feet broad, and 14 feet hgh in the roof. It is in form an irregular or oblong octagon - the two sides long, and the three sections at each end, of course, narrow, thus giving, by the cross reflections of no fewer than 19 mirrors, an infinite multiplicity of its internal treasures. Of these the shells are the leading feature, and many cartloads of the rarest sorts go to make up this conchological wonder. The floor is covered with a very rich carpet, and rugs to match front two unique dwarf grates. The seats set on imitation granite props are covered with a rich crimson velvet. Opposite the stained glass entrance door in a recess is a beautiful fountain, supported on large ornamental shells, as pedestals, playing from a delightful spring, the jet rising from a rich green vase in tasteful contrast with the 'winking gold fish' now sporting and now lazily floating round its base. The side walls are inlaid in the most regular and artistic manner with shells, which vary in size, the roof being studded with large ornamental shells, the upward unseen points of which, being bored, act as ventilators, while in the centre of the roof some of the very choicest middle-sized shells are grouped together in the form of flowers, with a very rich and beautiful effect, seldom attained in the choicest bouquets. With so much of the beautiful so very attractively arranged, the mirrors work wonders. The large mirrors at either end show a line of tables as long as the orchard, and multiply the visitors accordingly, green vases and golden fish presenting themselves anew at every turn. The Doon ran silently past as we entered, but here it meanders round us on every side, and our fairy palace seems the centre of some enchanted island. It is, indeed, a beautiful grotto, and all who have not seen it will, we daresay, on visiting it, not begrudge it the title of the 'Shell Palace'.

Henry & Grant's New Guide, c1869/1870, p35-36

Among latest undertakings of late David Auld was "the erection, in the garden grounds of the Hotel, of a small octagon edifice which - clad inside with countless shells of almost every size from almost every land, large mirrors being juxtaposed around the walls so as to magnify the dimensions of the edifice and reproduce over and over again the central fountain - remains a last memorial of his ingenious persever[36]ance and good taste, and is fitly named the Shell Palace. It might indeed be the boudoir of the Naiad of Doon".

THE STORY

Handwritten notes, photocopy with Sheila Penny, Feb 2012

	Greenfield House was built, c.1754, by the middle-aged Elias Cathcart: it was "a commodious and not inelegant house, which he called Greenfield." He died, after 22 years of ownership, and was succeeded by 13-year-old son, David, later Lord Alloway. He married Mary Muir of Blairstone, through whom he succeeded to Blairstone. He died, aged 66, and was succeeded in 1829 by Elias Cathcart, who, the following year, sold Greenfield to Hunter of Doonholm. It was sold, again, in 1853, to James Baird, "who almost immediately pulled down and removed the house of Geeenfield from the Cambusdoon Policy Field and had it re-erected stone by stone along with the surrounding wall, on its present site. The beams rafters &c were all marked in Roman numerals. Mr Baird had that house removed and rebuilt with the view - according to those well in the know - of handing it over as a manse when the new church was built. That however did not come to pass, as Miss Blackburn got busy on having a new manse erected." AJL.
Love (per SPenny)	Prior to the erection of Cambusdoon, a smaller mansion known as Greenfield stood here, a home of Lord Alloway.

DUNURE ROAD, --, BALGARTH

Ayr List 103 — J A Morris, c.1902, enlarged c.1909. Large 2-storey detached villa, partly neo-jacobean and modern movement motifs, snecked rubble with ashlar dressings, slated roof with boldly projecting eaves, straight skewed gables. pedimented dormer heads of varying design, one curvilinear and one triangular on NW front. SE front has advanced gabled centre projection with gabled entrance porch of further projection to left. To left, taller asymmetrical gable rises over 2 gabled single-storey outshots of unequal size on right NW frontage. 4-window section with dormer heads on left, 2 window section of 2 full storeys on right. Broad canted bay projection on left at SW gable. Unfortunate modern extension on right. Interior work of note has now been partly modernised. Ref: Nicoll, Domestic Architecture in Scotland, 1911. CS, due to modern additions and alterations.

Nicoll — Built several years ago to suit the special requirements of the owner, it was afterwards remodelled as shown above. The walls are of red stone, and the roof of grey Westmorland slates. the external woodwork is white. James A Morris.
